TO

HIS EXCELLENCY, JULES J. JUSSERAND,

Ambassador of France to the United States, who for a score of years has fostered and cemented

the friendship between these Republics,

THIS WORK—

A Roll of Honor for the United States and a Record of Appreciation from France—is affectionately dedicated by the compiler.

DURING the Revolution in France, the existence of outward marks of distinction was forgotten. Nobility was suppressed by the decrees of June 19, 1790, but provision was made for bestowing some token upon all who had assisted in the overthrow of the Bastile. The difficulties that attended the conferring of the "brevet" were so great that it was realized that safety lay in the abolition of all decorations. This was accomplished by the laws of July 30, 1791, and July 28, 1793.

The first suggestion of a "national order which should cause all distinctions of birth to be forgotten" was made on December 15, 1791, when it was proposed to confer some sort of honor upon soldiers for gallant conduct. This soon bore fruit in special acts of the convention providing crowns of laurel or of oak for heroes of battle and even a proposition to create rules for the "recognition of merit and reward therefor."

During the First Consulate, the Senate prepared a list of "notables" or "eligibles" who could be called upon for any service the government might demand. This list did not meet with the approval of Napoleon, and, it is believed, he sought to counteract the political complexion of it by preparing an independent list to which should be given the name "Legion d'Honneur."

The first intimation of this purpose was made early in May, 1802. The Act was placed before the Council of State for discussion on May 4, was passed on to the "Corps legislatif" on May 14 without having received the sanction of the Council and after five hours' discussion it was adopted by the "Corps legislatif" on May 19, the "Tribunal" in the meantime having acted favorably upon the proposition. It was finally promulgated as a law on June 3.

Up to this time, no mention had been made of a visible and outward sign of membership in the Legion. A simple decree on July 10, 1803, prescribed the shape and colors of the insignia. This was changed in 1816, 1830, 1851, 1852 and 1870.

Napoleon decreed March 1, 1808, that all members of the Legion should have the title of Chevalier and that the title should be transmitted from father to son.

The first ceremony of investiture was held on July 14, 1804.

The promises regarding equality and heredity had been violated in the final ordinances of the Legion of Honor. Consequently the bestowal of the insignia was met with varying degrees of approval. Marshal Augerau refused to come forward when his name was called, Lemercier and Truguet returned their diplomas, Rochambeau and LaFayette refused to accept the honor and others sought to conceal the "emblem of the vanity of a courtier." Some persons, out of sympathy with the new régime, sought to bring this decoration into ridicule by creating mock decorations which they gave to the rabble to wear. But such care had been exercised in the selection of persons for admission into the Legion that at the second distribution there were no refusals.

The original purpose of the Order can best be learned from Napoleon's own words: "I challenge anyone to show me a republic, ancient or modern, in which there were no distinctions. You may call them playthings, but men are led by playthings. I should not say this, perhaps, in the Council Chamber, but in the presence of men of wisdom, such things should be spoken. I do not believe that the French people love liberty and equality; the French have not been changed by ten years of revolution; they are Gauls as of old—proud and light-hearted, having one pre-eminent virtue—honor. This virtue should be nourished and upon it some distinction should be conferred. You see how our people prostrate themselves before foreign decorations; some wear them, while others look upon this with surprise. Voltaire has called our soldiers Alexanders at five sous a day. He was right. Do you suppose that men can be induced to go to war by analytical reasoning? Never! It might be efficacious for the scholar in his study. To the soldier must be offered glory, honor, reward. If honors are given to soldiers only, the nation would cease to exist. If, on the other hand, all professions should be included, the soldier not knowing how to read or write, would be proud to have as a reward for the blood he shed the same decoration that is worn by men of great scholarship, while the latter, on their part, would esteem more highly the recompense for their labors when they see it is the reward of bravery. Some officers may object to seeing their decorations worn by a priest, judge, author, artist or a simple soldier. But why? Is courage not always courage, and is blood not always blood?"

And although the great emperor forgot his earlier plea for democracy in honors and instituted orders that were intensely aristocratic, the Legion d'Honneur which he called into existence is now by far the most democratic institution amongst men. No antecedent qualifications are demanded; the single condition that must be met is superiority. Superior service; superior talent; superior achievements. No limit is placed on the character of service, the sort of talent nor the nature of the achievements beyond the requirement that, in some field they count for the betterment of France, the welfare of a people or the uplift of mankind.

Coming into existence amidst the clamors for equality it greets all men equal in the contest for its acquisition and, having celebrated its centennial at the same time when men, by their own efforts have been set apart in classes, it can most fittingly reward one with a cross and another with the more modest knot of ribbon.

Looking over this institution and contemplating the men who have worn with pardonable pride "the splash of red," the least that each "Legionnaire" can do is to endeavor to maintain the prestige of the Order by becoming more worthy of the membership he enjoys.

This compilation is made in the earnest desire that each person named herein as he notes his colleagues and considers the services or achievements that earned this distinction will realize more fully the great honor that has been conferred upon him and see how fully and promptly France shows her esteem and appreciation.

* * * *

This Directory includes the names of Legionnaires of France who were living at the time the manuscript went to the printer. An exception, however, was made in the case of officers decorated for services during the War who succumbed to wounds received in action or died subsequently, weakened no doubt, by strain or exposure incident to their war duties. The inclusion of their names is intended to augment, if it be possible, our appreciation of their supreme sacrifice.

In preparing the material for this work the Compiler has been greatly aided by Major William S. Biddle who furnished the names of Officers of the U. S. Army who had been decorated and kindly revised the list to make additions and changes in addresses. Most helpful assistance in preparing the sketches was rendered by Mr. Nils G. Radhe, Research Assistant, National Geographic Society.
